"Sh!" said her husband, "I don't like to hear you speak that way, Elsie. I don't see why you all have taken such a dislike to Miss Everdale. She is as fine a woman as I have met this to claim all of Roy Gilbert's attention that is no reason why you all should hate her."

"Oh, yes." answered his wife, "we all know that you men, married and single, have adored the ground she walks on, and the rest of us have been nowhere ever since she came. Not that I care, but I do hate to see a woman so forward and bold."

"Well, now, you just wait and hear what I have to tell," said Miss Wes- all, ton, the first speaker, and the group turned attentive faces to her.

"I have this straight from Will," she began "You see Will was down in the office quite late last night with a few of the other men, and among them was Roy Gilbert. He became very much interested in relating some of his adventures, and before he thought-as his manner showed afterward-he mentioned his wife "

"His wife!" they all exclaimed in one breath, and horror was visible on some countenances, while others wore a malicious triumphant expression.

"Yes, his wife," went on Miss Weston, evidently delighted that she had awakened so much interest, "And Will said some of the men looked kind of queer, and as though they pitied him, for he flushed as red as a schoolboy, and then Will said to him: 'Why Gilbert, old boy, we didn't know you bad a wife.
